We are to witness the inauguration of the recently elected President of Miami University, an event peculiarly interesting and pregnant with hope for this seat of literature and art. I shall detain you but a few moments, although the theme is so importune, that it might justly claim an extended development; but my motive for brevity, is the wish to afford the mind of this audience fresh and unwearied, to the address which will follow in the order of the exercises of the day. Studios, however, as I am, of condensing what I have to say upon the subject just named, I am too sensible of the obligations which this occasion originates, to withhold the full utterance of my views. The season is favorable for considering just such a topic as has been proposed, for the very air which we breathe, as...
