Excerpt from Geology of Pre-Tertiary Rocks in the Northern Part of Yellowstone National Park, Wyoming Indian Creek laccolith. Doming over the laccolith apparently caused the massive upper Paleozoic rocks to slide northward on the gently dipping Crowfoot fault zone. In late Paleocene and Eocene time, the rocks in the northern part of Yellowstone Park were broken by steep north west-trending reverse faults, which include (1) the faults of the north-dipping Gardiner fault zone and the associated reverse faults northeast of the Gallatin Range and (2) the south-dipping Grayling Creek fault southwest of the Gallatin Range. The Gallatin block was depressed between these bounding faults. Displacement on the Gardiner fault zone exceeds feet, and that on the Grayling Creek fault is uncertain, but it probably exceeds feet. The Gardiner fault zone is the southwest boundary of the uplifted Bear tooth block, which is the dominant structural feature in the north-central and northeastern parts of the park.
