Progress in metallurgical art is no exception. From direct iron and steel (made from ore in simple forges, and in one operation) we have come as far as the mild steel of commerce, made from ore through an intermediate impure blast-furnace product, pig iron. Further progress may be expected along the same lines. A growing demand for the maximum of strength in the minimum of weight is inevitable, an end attainable by a further complication in process: either super-refining, perhaps in electric furnaces, or heat treatment carried far beyond the practices now commonly used on small parts of good quality. Metallurgists and metallographists have only recently been impressed with the fact that various impurities and addition agents may affect the properties of finished steel far in excess of that expected by...
