Excerpt: .a survey of the room; and was not a little disappointed, as well as surprised, to find his audience so much diminished. I am persuaded Howard never has, in his own house, spoken so many words at one time, without interruption, since he was married. I endeavoured to soften his disappointment, by approving, and encouraging him to persevere in directing the conduct of his son. I cannot describe all that passed during three hours after breakfast, before the carriage was ordered. And, when it. was announced, no Horace was to be found. A counter order was given, and two hours more elapsed before it came again to the door, You admire mj'r patience; but I assure you I have no claim to that virtue in this instance, as I rather rejoiced at any delay that might prevent our arriving at Reading before five o'clock, the hour at which dinner was ordered. And, as I was fully determined not to return to George Street again, I felt less annoyance upon this occasion, than I should if I had expected to have again been one of Mrs. Howard's domestic party. My sister's anxiety became so great, that messengers were dispatched over half the town in search of her darling, as she frequently calls him. The butler, who seems well acquainted with his young master's tricks, went to a livery stable, which it appears he frequents; and there was informed that Mr. Horace...
