An aperture in the end of the house thus placed in the road was the only entrance, and by no means an easy one, measuring about three feet by one and a half. After exchanging presents with an elder, we walked through the town. The people were very civil; the children flocked out to see the white man; the little fellows would run past me, and then wait in the path to take a good look at my white face as I came forward, and then hastily scamper off. I do not know that I have seen finer or more lively boys, bright, smiling, well fed, and clean, just what all lads should A I OYAI. AUDIENCE. 73 be! It was near sun-down when we reached Welu s residence. He was absent when I arrived; but his son hastened to give me a kind welcome, and to show me the hut in which I was to stay. Here I was glad to rest my weary limbs; but, alas! it was not for long. Young /Velu soon came to say that it was a custom among them that strangers should sit outside, so that all the people may have an opportunity of looking at them. Yielding to his persuasive eloquence, I went out, and took up my seat beneath the palms, and resignedly made myself a public gazing stock for fifteen or twenty minutes. I then learned...
