Excerpt from Iron Corrosion: Anti-Fouling and Anti-Corrosive Paints Wherever rust has once formed, its further occurrence is a natural sequence, and its prevention becomes impossible by any known means unless the affected places are perfectly freed from all traces of the oxide. So far from being a Solid, coherent mass, rust is loose and porous, absorbing and persistently retaining water, and, with the conjunction of atmospheric air, assists in the conversion of such portions of the iron as have hitherto remained intact. This is the reason why Sheet iron, under conditions favouring rust for mation, is finally converted entirely into rust, and though retaining its form as a pipe, no longer consists of iron but of a compound which breaks in pieces under very Slight pressure. To this continuous development of rust is also due the complete corrosion of rivets and screws in iron structures, and the circumstance that iron pipes of several millimetres in thickness laid in the earth are entirely converted into rust and break in pieces or crumble away when brought to the daylight again.
