Excerpt: . . . wherethey were respectively used. Mr. Dawkins tells us what became of the cave men but says nothing about the fate of the river drift people of Europe, that were contemporary with the cave men. He seems to assume that the cave people of the Paleolithic period and their exterminators in the Neolithic were contemporary. What an absurdity! The neolithic Mongoloids (invaders) in part descended from the cave people and very I closely resembled them, but the latter were extinct long before the former came into Europe. VI. RUSSIAN LOESS DEPOSIT THE RELICS OF MAN AND LOESS An example possessing similar significance to the six we have considered consists in a certain deposit of loess. At Kiev, Southern Russia, where the general surface of the country is 630 feet above sea level, the Dnieper river has cut a trough in the plain 350 feet deep and deposited a loess 50 feet in thickness. Below this loess Armashevsky, a Russian geologist, found paleolithic implements. The professor made a report of his discovery to the International Congress in 1897. In 1900 Dr. G. Frederick Wright of America, and the professor visited the locality where the implements were found and made a survey of the conditions. REMARKS. -----The significance attached to this example consists in the fact that the implements were found, not in the loess, but below it. The absence of human relics in the loess can only be explained in a manner similar to that by which...
