E Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exechequer, Delivered in the House of Commons, March 12th, 1866 I have been anxious to explain how it is that the time for bringing in these papers has been deferred, not merely for the reason - comparatively one of secondary importance - that there have been here and there not unnatural indications of a disposition to murmur at the delay in the production of those papers, and to ascribe it to hesitation and vacillation of purpose on the part of the Government. Undoubtedly this has not been the case. So anxious have we been to give the House of Commons, so far as we could, the same means of judgment with ourselves; that I can truly state that on Friday evening I could not obtain for my own use a complete and finished copy of these papers, except the copy laid upon the table of the House of Commons, and which therefore passed out of my hands. But the question of time has an importance very different from that which it derives from its connection with vague rumors and vague imputations. It has this importance, that it is now the 12th of March when I make to you the first proposal, and considering the Easter recess is just at hand, it would not be possible for us to ask you to read the bill a second time until the second week in April. Therefore, we, as prudent and practical men, had to measure what our power might be with regard to legislation in the present session. Of course the question arose for consideration - Are we to have what is termed...
