Been ready for the last five minutes! Sure you ve got all the snowballs you can carry? I couldn t carry any more if I tried, came from Sam Rover, with a grin. Just see how I am loaded up, and he glanced down at both hands, which were filled with snowballs, and at the snowballs held under either arm. I ve got some dandy hard ones, put in Spud Jackson. Oh, you can t use soakers, Spud! cried Stanley Browne, who was the leader of the snowballing contingent. That s against the rules. They are not soakers, Stanley, was the reply. They are only good and hard, that s all. Hi, you fellows! When are you going to start things? came a cry from behind a snow wall up the slope of a hill. We can t waste the whole afternoon waiting for you. We re coming, don t fear, answered Stanley Browne. And when we arrive you won t know what s struck you, announced Sam Rover gaily. It s all vell enough to brag, but you d chust better start dot fight, came in German-American accents from behind the snow wall, and a merry face appeared in sight for an instant and a fist was shaken playfully at those beyond. Sound that bugle, Paul! yelled the leader of the attacking party, and an instant later the mellow notes of a bugle floated out on the crisp, wintry air.
