Excerpt from The Yale Literary Magazine, Vol. 58: March, 1893 That the trees in murmuring whispers tried To keep him company. Here he had come from a far away home For shining gold searched be. And he sought it high, and he sought it low, He sought untiringly. I fancied I saw o'er his bended brow A jeweled crown of gold. But he knew it not and he saw it not, Yet ne'er was such of old. The primeval trees swayed their sturdy boughs, And cried Lift up thy head. Take now thy crown, moaned the furious wind. He heard not what they said. The strange spell had passed ere I looked again, The wondrous crown had gone. The whippoorwill's cry is heard through the dale, And still he searches on. P7. Wallace CM.
