Fig. 150 serves to show the clearness with which the arrangement of all apparatus and piping may be shown in one view by means of an isometric drawing. By this method the horizontal lines of an object are drawn to scale at an angle of 30 degrees with the horizontal. The vertical lines of the object are so indicated on the isometric drawing, also to scale. To fully represent by regular mechanical drawing a box 2X3X6 ft., for example, would require three views, plan, side or front and end elevations. It could be shown equally well if not better by an isometric drawing as illustrated in Fig. 158. To draw a circle isometrically, inscribe it in a square the sides of which are of the same length as the diameter of the circle, then connect the points midway of the length of each side by a curved line, as illustrated in Figs. 159 and 160. This rule is useful in drawing cylinders, valve wheels, fittings, etc. This method of drawing is somewhat harder to acquire than the three-view method, but is far easier for workmen to comprehend. The writer once had this illustrated when he was sent for by the operator of a pipe cutting machine, to whom had been given a drawing of some large pipe connections, shown in plan, elevation and side view. The writer endeavored to explain what was required, but the workman insisted on having the piping sketched out either...
