Excerpt from Applied Science, Vol. 21: February, 1908 The third consideration and a very important one is that of pressure. Most towns cover a territory more or less varied as to elevation. A great difference in level in the different parts of a town makes the problem somewhat complicated, because the pressure sufficient to carry water to the most elevated district will be embarrassingly great in the lower ones and consequently it is frequently necessary to reduce the pressure in the house connections in the latter case. On the other hand it is frequently necessary to have a separate high pressure system to reach the more elevated portions of the town. This is generally accomplished by pumping into a small distributing reservoir. This necessitates an independent system of mains. The great advantage of a high pressure at the hydrants is in connection with the fire service. Frequently if the pressure is high, streams may be got upon a fire by merely connecting the hose with the hydrants.
