SECTION the reserve, was the spectator of his actions. At l. the conclusion of the fight, when the King was il, hastening to congratulate him on his victory, the young Prince eluding his embrace, fell on his knees and implored a fathers blessing. Perhaps the annals of the world do not supply us with a nobler instance of filial piety. It was in this battle that the aged king of Bohemia disdaining to yield, fell under the irresistible attack of the Prince. --I mention this circumstance, because the three ostrich feathers worn by the Bohemian monarch, were assumed by the Prince of Wales, and by him, bequeathed to all his successors. Capture of To this memorable battle succeeded the equally cii. ii. . . memorable seige and capture of Calais; from which he embarked in triumph for England. But he was not long to remain...
