Hunt, when he was informed that Vicat cement could be obtained, wrote to us as follows: I am delighted that the Vicat cement is in the market again after an absence of some fifteen years. This cement was used in the Delaware and Hudson Canal Companys building with excellent results. Messrs. Norcross Brothers and other large contractors that have built and are erecting stone buildings, now use Vicat cement, and it therefore seems appropriate that the architects who write specifications should insist on Vicat cement being used for setting limestone, and when used according to instructions, no stain will appear. Yours very truly, Howard Fleming. THE PROTESTANT CHURCH-BUILDING CONGRESS. Berlin, Gkrmanv. March 3, 1S91. To The Editors Of The American Architect: --Dear Sirs, --I have read your article in January 27 issue, regarding the Congress in Berlin for Protestant church-building with great interest...
