You will find it a more healthy life than the one you propose, and probably get as strong as you can wish. Arthur began to consider whether it was not his duty to follow the doctor s advice. Mary hoped that he would do so, as he would then live at home with her. Mr Maitland promised every encouragement, remarking-- Now I have lost poor Gilbert, there is no one else to keep on the farm when I am gone, or to afford a home to Mary. s This latter argument weighed greatly with Arthur. He had had indeed no definite aim in his wish to go to college; he might perhaps become a master in a school, or take pupils at the university, or should he get a fellowship, obtain a living, but he had never thought even in that case of the duty of striving to win souls for Christ, Of the gospel and its requirements he had a very imperfect knowledge. Possessing a more gentle and loving spirit than Hugh, he thought it would be pleasant to go about among the poor, to try and make them moral and good, and relieve them in distress. There were very few cottagers in their neighbourhood who required much assistance. When any of them were sick, he and Mary had found much satisfaction in carrying them food and delicacies which they were unable to procure, and in helping them sometimes with money...
