Having indicated what projections are and how obtained, it will be well, before giving their grand divisions and sub-divisions, to state the nature and extent of the field in which they may be employed. The mathematical properties of geometrical figures, as also the propositions and problems involving them, are divided into two classes, metrical and descriptive. In the first class the idea of quantity necessarily enters, either directly - as in measurement, or indirectly - as in ratio. In the second or descriptive class, however, we find involved only those properties dependent upon relative position. 6. Descriptive Geometry is that branch of mathematics in which figures are represented and their descriptive properties investigated and demonstrated by means of projection. Divisions Of Projections. 7. All projections may be divided into two general classes. Central and Parallel. If the centre of projection be at a finite distance, as in Figs. 2 and 3, the projection obtained is called a central projection; but if we suppose it to be at infinity, as in Fig. 4, projectors from it will then evidently be parallel, and the resulting figure is called a parallel projection of the original figure. Parallel projection is thus seen to be merely a special case of central projection, yet each has been independently developed to a high degree and has an extensive literature. 8. The terms Conical and Cylindrical are employed by many writers synonymously with central and parallel respectively. Central projections are also occasionally called Radial or Polar. Remark.-A straight line is said to generate a conical surface (see Fig. 5) when it constantly passes through a fixed point (the...
