Excerpt: . . . that Robinson is in the next room; and I am wrong, for the voice I hear is Browns. But if I look into the next room and see that it is Brown and not Robinson who is speaking, I correct the belief, and attribute the voice to Brown. If, however, in spite of this experience--of this opportunity of correcting my belief--I still maintain that the voice is Robinsons, -if, in short, my error is incorrigible when ample means of correcting it are furnished--then it ceases to be a mistake, and becomes a Delusion. So if I maintain that Brown is locked up in the cellar when he is not, the erroneous belief may be a mistake or may be a delusion. But if I go to the cellar and find it empty, and, having searched it and locked it, I still maintain that Brown is there, the...
