Excerpt: . . . but there were many passages of my life into which she could not enter; nor would I have had her. What would she have done, poor thing! struggling with the fierce present, or walking amidst the dark shadows and phantoms of the future! Charles was all kindness; but life to him was, as yet, a gay frolic. Spirro loved me dearly, and I could not have loved him better; but he was a mere boy. I must appear to him, not the weak woman, but the firm, heroic, elder sister, who could sustain him. Eugene Beauvais comprehended me, and more than comprehended me. With him, I never was alone. He might have been sometimes alone; I cannot say--but I, never. With his eye of sympathy, he looked through the intricacies of my nature. Whatever gave me delight, he understood better than myself. If I was pained,...
