Not illustrated. 1859 Excerpt: .stranger to his haunts had come, While, year by year, that forest high Hung changeless o'er his lonely home. Long time were greeting hands entwined, Long time they cheer'd the social board With many an earnest question kind, And eager answer freely pour'd. But when the sun's great heat was quell'd Beneath the western ocean's wave, The stranger's hand the exile held, And led him to the forest-grave. There, while the round moon rose afar, Making the listener's face look pale, While, one by one, broke each bright star Unmark'd, he told his simple tale. Green grow the valleys of the west, Bright bound the streams of dark Tyrone, There are my father's bones at rest, Where I shall never lay my own. Here drowsy Nature lies asleep, Crush'd by her own abundant treasure, But there her restless pulses leap For ever to a changeful measure; To moaning of the fitful gale Through hollows in the purple hill, To rivers rattling down the vale, Short showers, and sunbeams shorter still. Ours was a lonely mountain place, Girt round with berried rowan trees: Good Sir, the wind on that hill's face, It would not let them grow like these. But, looking down the mountain bare, We saw the white church by the river, And we could hear, when winds were fair, O'er the low porch, the one bell quiver. And though the path was...
