Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Mineral Resources of Canada: Bulletin on Apatite (Phosphate of Lime) In many of the mines of this district, more especially in the group west of the Lievre, the apatite is found in the unassive form in pockets and irregular veins which occur in the mass of the pyroxene itself. These pockets have been described by several writers as forming true beds, but a close examination over a large series failed to show this feature. In some of the occurrences the quantity of the apatite was very large, exhibiting a chimney like structure, and where several of those were found, occurring along a fairly well defined course, the series were often connected by small stringers of the mineral, though this was by no means a universal feature. Many of these occurrences were found to be shallow isolated deposits with no indication of bed or vein structure, and in the early days of mining much of the work was, to a large extent, confined to (attracting the apatite from these surface shows, since such mining required but a small amount of capital, and when one was exhausted another could be readily found. In some of the larger mines however a system of deep mining was instituted, and before the close of the industry in 1892-93 several of the shafts and workings were carried to a depth of several hundred feet, following downward along a system of irregular veins and pocket masses which continued to the lowest depths reached.
