Section of Shell of Echinus. tends m layers United by e 0, portions of a deeper layer. perpendicular pillars, but so arranged that the open spaces, or meshes, in one layer correspond to the solid structure in the next. The spheroid of the Echinus is covered with spines, and both outside and inside by a contractile and extensile transparent membrane, which supports the shelly plates at the poles, and dips between the bands but does not penetrate them. Its extensile nature admits of the addition of calcareous matter to the edges of the plates when the animal is increasing in size. The membrane lining the interior of the shelly globe is tough; it encloses the digestive organs, and forms a muscular lip to the mouth, which is armed with five triangular, sharp-pointed, white teeth, and surrounded by five pairs VOL. 11.
