In stony mountain regions their houses were made of stone; in the more fertile plains they utilized sun-baked mud reinforced with straw and twigs rammed into movable forms of wicker, sticks and poles. The first Americans were, indeed, ahead of us in making use of the principles of what we now call reinforced concrete construction. Their methods, to be sure, were crude and their materials defective, but the essentials of our up-to-date twentieth century constructions were known to this aboriginal people many centuries before the existence of America was even suspected in Europe. The Spaniards taught the aborigines to make walls of sun-dried brick, the adobe method of building that is now looked upon as characteristic of Mission architecture in Arizona, California, New Mexico and other neighborhoods Figure 3.
