Excerpt from Oxidation and Reduction in Organic Chemistry From the Standpoint of Potential Differences: The System Hydroquinone and Quinone (1) What was attempted? (2) In how far were the attempts successful? (3) What contribution actually new to the science of Chemistry has been made? (1) It has been undertaken (a) to determine whether the tendency of a typical organic oxidation from one non-electrolyte to another, or its reversal, to take place gives rise to a constant, measurable and reproducible potential difference, when the concentrations of all of the substances entering into the electrochemical equation, by which the process may be theoretically represented, are fixed; and (b) to determine whether this potential varies with the concentrations of these substances in the same way that inorganic potentials have been found to vary, viz., approximately in accordance with the law of Mass Action as expressed in the van t Hoff isotherm. (2) A typical case was chosen which was practically adapted to such an investigation, namely, the oxidation of hydroquinone to quinone, or its reverse. It was found that whenever the concentrations could be...
